Lengthening out my tiny current, Day and night I tireloss ran, Through the meadow, where the desistes Fleck the emersid tarf with snow, With the sunshing on my besom,

Singing merrily I go. Through the wood, with troops of shadows Dancing to the restless leaves; Where the wild vines o'er me streaming Many a quaint, weired chaplet weaves.

And the sun, like golden rain-drops, Filters through the taken screen. Where the moss-heds and the lichens, Edge my path with tufts of green!

Down the rocky hillside sliding

In and out, from stair to stair.
Till, midway the rocks o'ersweeping,
One swift plunge, the last, I dare. Then, from out the white foam stealing.

Past the mill I make my way.

Where the panderous wheel hands dripping.

Green with moss for many a day;

Underneath the little foot-bridge Where the surburnt children fish, With their bare feet downward dangling For my cooling lies to kies.

Hiding in the rocky shadows, Shining by the dusty way: Murmaring by the lowly cottage, Whispering 'neath old turnets gray,

Chiming this refrain forever,

As I tinkling ripple an: Tis the heart we bear within us

Maketh life a sigh, or song.

Miscellaneous.

The Five Pcints, The following, from the novel by Geo. William Curtis, "Trumps," now being published in Harper's Weekly, is a fearfully true picture of the life of multitude, in New York city. It is drawn by the hand of a master :

"And in all the streets of the great city. in all the lofty workshops and yards and factories, huge hammers smote and clashed, and men, naked to the waist, reeking in dingy interiors, bent like gnomes a their tasks, while saws creaked, wheels turned, planes and mallets and chisels shoved and cut and struck : and down in damp cellars, sallow, ghastly men and women wove rag-carpets and twisted baskets in the midst of litters of puny, pale children, with bleared eyes and sore heads and dirty faces, tumbling, playing, shouting, whimpering—scampering after the pigs that came rooting and noising in the liquid filth that simmered and stank to heaven in the gutters at the top of the steps; and the houses above the heads of the ghastly men and women were swarming rookeries, hot and close and bare, with window panes broken, and hats and coats and clothes stuffed in, and men with bloodshot eyes and desparate faces sitting doggedly with their hats on, staring at nothing, or leaning on their ragged ellows and bear and leaning on their ragged ellows. Basel and the dissission with the Bush, above St. Joseph from all parts of kaness, Nebraska and Western lowa. Travelers from Nebraska and dirty faces, tumbling, playing, shoutnothing, or leaning on their ragged elbows on broken tables, seewling from between their dirty hands at the world and the future ; while in higher rooms sat sol itary girls in hard wooden chairs, a pile of straw, covered with a rug, in the cor ner, and a box to put a change of linen in, driving the needle silently and ceaselessly through shirts or coats or trowsers, sing over in the foul air during the Exchange and Land Warrants heat of the day, straining their eyes when the day darkened to save a candle, hearing the roar and the rush and the murmur Collections promptly made. Then she took up the work again, and the needle, with whose little point, in pain and sickness and consuming solitude, in darkness, desclation, and flickering faith, she pricked back death and dishonor.
